The constitutional freedom to travel includes the freedom to enter and abide in any state in the Union.¹ However, the means or mode of traveling may be subjected to reasonable regulations.² While the freedom to travel within the United States has been held to be a basic right under the Federal Constitution which is independent of a specific provision therein,³ the right of locomotion has also been held to be a part of the "liberty" guaranteed by the Due Process Clause.⁴ The right to migrate protects residents of one state from being disadvantaged or from being treated differently, simply because of the timing of their migration, from other similarly situated residents. Laws which burden the right to migrate must be necessary to further a compelling state interest.⁵ In addition to protecting persons against the erection of actual barriers to interstate movement, the right to travel when applied to residency requirements protects new residents of a state from being disadvantaged because of their recent migration or from otherwise being treated differently from longer term residents.⁶ Thus, the Supreme Court has stated that the liberty secured by the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment consists, in part, in the right of a person to live and work where he or she will.⁷

State law implicates the constitutional right to travel when it actually deters such travel, when impeding travel is its primary objective, or when it uses any classification which it serves to penalize exercise of that right.⁸

The Supreme Court has accepted as constitutional the federal statute authorizing the incarceration of material witnesses in advance of trial.⁹ Similarly, the Uniform Act to Secure Attendance of Out-of-State Witnesses does not violate the 14th Amendment by unduly restricting a citizen's right to ingress and egress.¹⁰ Also, a state sex offender registration statute that prohibits higher-risk registered sex offenders from living within a specified distance of a school or daycare center does not infringe on a constitutional right to intrastate travel.¹¹ A bona fide residence requirement of a state statute, which is appropriately defined and uniformly applied with respect to attendance in free public schools, does not violate the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment, and does not burden or penalize the constitutional right of interstate travel.¹² However, a state's restriction of its civil service preference to veterans who entered the armed forces while residing in the state violates the constitutionally protected right to travel.¹³

Practice Tip:

The "strict scrutiny" standard of constitutional review applies where the violated interest is a fundamental personal right or civil liberty, such as the right to interstate travel.¹⁴

The Supreme Court has stated that the right to travel abroad is a part of the "liberty" of which a citizen cannot be deprived without due process of law.¹⁵ However, the constitutional liberty to travel abroad is subject to limitations.¹⁶ Thus, freedom to travel abroad with a "letter of introduction" in the form of a passport issued by the sovereign is subordinate to national security and foreign policy considerations and is, as such, subject to reasonable governmental regulation, inasmuch as the freedom to travel outside the United States is distinguishable from the right to travel within the United States.¹⁷
